My sky was not always so cloudless. The iden that Mr. Crefton could regard me as anything but a mere school girl had not occurred to me. Mrs. Renten told me and the others that Ler brother was pleased to find at the house a child intelligent enough for a companion, yet to young for flirtation and scandal, and that, were I older, he would not permit himself to offer such marked attentions. Yet Miss Monkto a aid her set made me so uncomfortable by a series of petty annoyances that I dreaded to enter the drawing room, and once or twice I even dined in the nursery with the twins to escare their little malice

I could not accomplish this, do as I would. I was sitting with Maggieone twilight, holding her hand while she went to sleep, when Amelia and Conrad stopped to talk in the hall. The door was partly open, but they did not perceive it, and as my name was almost the first word spoken, I could not refrain from quietly listening to what came next.

"How lidiculous Gilbert Crofton's manner is toward that absurd child !" said Amelia. "She isn't absurd, and he isn't ridiculous," replied Courad. "She is a bright little thing, homely to be sure, but perfectly unassuming and good natured almost to a fault; and he.] imagine, is glad to come across one of the sex who doesn't flatter him, and who doesn't say 'yes' eternally to his remarks and propositions, however extravagant they may be "At any rate it isn't right for him to be so exclusive in his attentions. By and by she will think he wants to marry her. " Perhaps he will want to marry her, but I lose n y guess if she isn't as much astonished as anybody when be tells her so, if he ever does. One thing, however, is certain, Amelia, you only lower yourself by joining those ill-bred Alians in snubbing Miss Marion. I have seen Crof on's face turn absolutely white with rage when Clara Allan has stung her with her mean suspicious shafts." The speakers passed on, leaving me grieved and at gry, and crushed beneath a vague sense of it justice which I could not entirely understand I haif resolved not to go down to dinher, and then I remembered that Angelica was gene, and that no one would be willing to play for the dancing, or to bear poor Mr. Blakeman's pettishness; so, instead of indulging myself in an unhappy evening alone, I made my prettiest to lette, did my duty thoroughly and cheerfully, and was rewarded by a precious half hour with Mis. She walked, and drove, and sat beside ber, describing everybody and everything about them, and fornishing her with all those little hints and suggestions which in conversation are telegraphed by the eyes. But I took her place, agreat relief to her and no hardship to me especially as Mr. Crotton sometimes assisted me for an hour, thus giving me time to run about the parden and fulfill my promise to man ma.

I had been at Firgrove three months when napa whole me that he could no longer spare Lis caring. Mr. Crefton brought the letter to me in the library and sto a waiting for me to read i', after which he wished me to join Mrs. Rei 'or and himself in a walk to the Crags. "What does papa write !" he asked, as I began to retold the sheet.

"He writes that I must go home directly, for he connot spare his darling any longer." I hen Mr Crotton sale gravely and tenderly, "Neither can 1 sp re my darling." Not will standing be was so serious, 1 thought he was making sport of me. My cheeks crimsoned and ny eyes flashed, and I said, "When you have leased me heretofore, Mr. Crofton, it has been on dif. rent subjects. To make sport of me low amounts to an ir sult." "I am not making sport of you, Marion," he answered very gently. "I have loved you, God alone knows how much, ever since the first werk of our acquaintance, when you moved so quietly about, sending peace and sunshine through the discordant elements of my sister's house. I ought to have spent this autumn at Aspenholt, but I could not leave you. I cannot part with you now, Marion Let me try to make you love me." He took my hand as he spoke and looked full into my eyes. I think he saw there an answering ferver, for at that moment I became conscious of my own affection for him-an affection which had been strengthening hour by hour for many days. He must have seen it, I am sure, for he snatched me up in his arms, and carrying me straight to Mrs. Renton's sitting-room, he exclaimed, "Mary, I have Scarcely, indeed, was Mrs. Renton out of the bouse before mamma started for the city to com. mence preparations for a splendid bridal

I can with difficulty persuade myself that that was six months ago, or that I am really writing in this noble library, with my husbard's kiss warm upon my lips and the servant's "Mrs. Crofton" echcing in my ears.
